Security Barometer: Business Journals for Risk Managers

Created by the Security Executive Council

A wise risk manager needs to understand the environment security programs are operating in. One of the best ways to obtain that knowledge is to keep up-to-date on the organization, industry and the economy. It's not just about the housing market and global debt, instead it's having a broad understanding of what the organization is facing in terms of its customers, employees, suppliers, and competitors. Keeping an eye on what is important to your executive team will help you when it comes to communicating risk to management.

More than any other organization, the Security Executive Council has been focusing on communicating to business executives the importance of taking a holistic viewpoint of risk management. One way we do this is to spread the word in selected business journals that executives focus on.

Some recent examples include:
